Bothwell, who is the new star just appearing above the horizon of her life, has only a swagger to offer his love.

Tragedy of "Mary Staart."

Save for the occasional songs in verse, the text of the play is prose. The Italian secretary is singing one of the love songs when he is surprised by the King. Aiready his language contains veiled threats against Riccio, Darnley reproaches his wife for the attendance of the Italian whom she refuses to dismiss out of pilty for the "poor half wil" who has been selected to serve the purposes of her enemies. Under her window Darnley sings the insulting "Who's in the Queen's Chamber?" while the Queen bemoans the fate that has deprived her of defending queenship that she may defend her Italian clerk. In all her conversations there is the regret that life invites no exercise of her real powers.

Her interview with Sir Thomas Randolph, Ambassador from the Court of England, carrying further the dissatisfaction with her life and revealing her shrewd knowledge of the plotters by whom she is surrounded; the arrival faction with her life and revealing her purposance of the insulting song of the King under her window, and her purposance of the insulting song of the King under her window, and her purposance of the confederates of Darnley — these scenes carry the study of the Queen's character to its end on an unresolved chord. She dissapears from view as she came and the voices that began the play are the last that fall on the ears of the audience.

NEW BURLESQUE AT COLUMBIA.

A new burlesque called "Jolittles of 1920," was presented at the Columbia Theatre last night. In the company were Cliff Bragdon, Sammy Howard, Miss Helen Tarr, Miss Norma Barry, Harold Carr, Frank Mallahan, Saul Anker, Lester Whitaker, William Russ, Leo Gold, Harold Kolb, Franklin Perry, Misses Helen Rikhoff and Lillian Norward, and a large chorus wood, and a large chorus.

There will be ample time to discuss the qualities of the new work, which was liberally applauded by the audience at the fall of the curtain. But the greatest part of the enthusiasm went to Miss Eames, who had given a superb portrayal of the heroine. Mr. Drinkwater han his own technique, of which ic or his admirers have often boasted. But anybody can demand that it be effective with the medium he employs. Parts of the play last night were deeply interesting. The murder of Eiccio drams.
